FSX P3D LatinVFR EL PRAT Barcelona 1.3 SKIDROWThe Sonics name and logo are strong, iconic symbols of the NBA and Seattle. Now, thanks to a media deal between Comcast SportsNet and the Sonics, the Sonics name and logo will appear in a small way on Comcast SportsNet websites. It's a good move. I'm comfortable with it. I think the Sonics are a great name and a great franchise, and I'm glad they're back in Seattle. And it's a sign of progress that, in the last couple of years, I've begun to find most people I talk to in Seattle have a warm fuzzy feeling about the Sonics. But I have never been comfortable, especially in recent years, with the league's branding decisions. This goes far beyond just the Sonics, of course. Fans and media alike have been complaining about a lack of passion and attention by the league and the individual teams for years. My biggest complaint is the league's insistence on a generic corporate identity. The league's "Big 3" logos have been criticized for years, and the four-year run of the red-black-and-blue-on-blue logos (along with all the other pregame gimmicks) was taken as a slap in the face to the folks in Seattle. Fans were especially incensed when the league adopted the Los Angeles Lakers logo for the All-Star Game, which was hosted by Seattle. It was a slap in the face, and a reminder that the teams in Los Angeles get all the support and attention. So it's not surprising that, in an effort to be more inclusive and responsive to the marketplace, the league is now considering three new logos. It's the first time we've seen new "official" logos since the league began team rebranding in 1999. The league already had a new championship logo, which debuted in 1999 with the league's 16th season. That logo, in bright, gold-white-on-blue, will remain as the league's official logo. But now the league wants to go back to an old theme, the "league paint," which introduced a new logo -- silver-on-red -- in 1975. So which new logo will prevail? The All-Star Game logo? The NBA logo in Golden State? The team logos? No clue. On Monday, the league will conduct a Web contest for fans f678ea9f9e
